

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

A method for automatic determination of color-density correction values for the reproduction of digital image data, wherein image color-density values of the digital image data are determined at least by area, and are compared with corresponding, known reproduction color-density values. For better results, eye scleras are identified within the image data, and image color-density values are determined from them.